The NATO SFA COE's new VOLOCOM platform was introduced with the object of bridging the gap of adaptability and innovation of information.

It allows information to be conveyed in a fast, lean and agile way, and the Guided Search Engine is capable of branching out through a predictive and analytical vision in the areas of greatest interest to the NATO SFA COE.

This concept opens up to the purpose-driven scenario that allows an information facilitator within the dynamism of information in response to "a future that is no longer what it once was".

The pandemic and the international crises of the last years have sent us an alarming message: we have completely lost the illusion of living on a planet without risks, without threats.

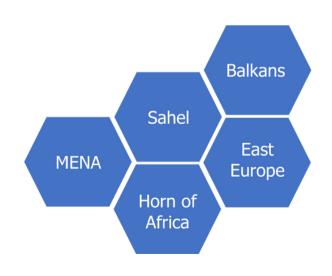

The platform, structured around 5 main research areas and 5 geographical areas of study and interest (as shown in the image), permits research to be oriented in a precise way and to become a planning and evaluation tool aimed at offering solutions that consolidate the vision of Security Force Assistance in the leadership of the stabilization processes of crisis areas.

In a nutshell, innovation, which by its definition breaks down barriers, creates fractures and regenerates ideas, will increasingly have to respond to a regenerative logic of innovability.
